

This week's question:

At the end of neilah on Yom Kippur, a number of congregants leave immediately to eat their post Yom Kippur refreshments. They do not recite havdalah beforehand, presumably because they do not know how to. Should the congregation delay maariv so that someone may recite havdalah over wine for the early eaters? Should he drink the wine before he davens maariv, or should he give it to one of those planning to eat now? May the rest of the congregation rely on this for their havdalah, despite the fact that they will be davening maariv after it? Is there any issue with mentioning havdalah in maariv after fulfilling one's obligation by hearing it said over wine?

The issues:

- A) Havdalah – on wine and in tefilah
- B) Eating before havdalah; eating before maariv
- C) Shomaia keoneh, discharging others' obligation; Araivus, responsibility for others
- D) Tosfos Yom Hakipurim, extending the holiness of Yom Kippur

A) Havdalah

This mitzvah is derived from the pesukim that teach us the mitzvah of kiddush. 'Mention the Shabbos day to sanctify it' – mention the holiness of Shabbos, to make it holier for us than each other day of the week. Therefore, we use words – kiddush – to formally sanctify Shabbos as it begins, to distinguish it from the preceding days, and havdalah, distinction, at the end of Shabbos to distinguish it from the following days.

Despite the scarcity of references to it by the Talmud, some imply a Scriptural obligation for both kiddush and havdalah. The Talmud also refers to the Scriptural obligation applying equally to men and women. However, in another context it seems Rabbinical. If one adopts a ban on wine, can this apply to wine drunk for mitzvos? The Talmud asks rhetorically: 'Are people obliged to recite kiddush and havdalah from the time of the giving of the Torah at Sinai?' This implies that it is not a Scriptural obligation, but Rabbinical. One answer is that the mitzvah to verbalize kiddush and havdalah is Scriptural. Doing it over a cup of wine is Rabbinical. Deriving the connection to wine from Scripture is considered asmachta, a linkage based on the Torah's reference to things adopted by the Rabbis. A second answer is that reciting over the wine is Scriptural. Drinking the wine is Rabbinical. In a third view, the reference to Sinai is not to be taken rhetorically. Literally, there is a Scriptural obligation for both kiddush and havdalah, and to drink the wine.

However, the initial institution of formal havdalah was to include it in the shemone esrai at maariv. The obligation on wine was added at a later date. If the primary Scriptural obligation is over wine, how could the Sages neglect this when instituting their authorized version? Accordingly, the poskim conclude that, at least in the view of this Talmudic passage, the entire mitzvah of havdalah is Rabbinical.

rely on araivus. However, if he did rely on it, he fulfills his obligation and need not repeat it. In our case, it seems obvious that the congregants eating right away have limited ability to say havdalah themselves. Furthermore, some maintain that fulfilling it in a group is preferred. In addition, the entire concept of araivus seems to have stronger implications here. The congregants would otherwise not fulfill havdalah, or at least, would violate the precept forbidding eating beforehand. Therefore, it is incumbent on one who is able to, to do it for them. Furthermore, as we have already mentioned, he may really fulfill the mitzvah himself at that time. He might wish to refrain from drinking the wine himself before maariv. [See Sukah 38b, Rosh Hashana 29a-b, Sanhedrin 27b Shavuos 29a, Psachim 101a, Poskim. Rambam, Brochos 1:10 (Kiryas Sefer) Shabbos 29:10. Chinnuch 31. Tur Sh. Ar. OC 167:19-20 213:1-3 219:5 (RAE) 273:4, commentaries.]

D) Tosfos Yom Hakipurim

There is one additional factor that comes into consideration here. One must add to the holiness of the day of Yom Kippur, both at the beginning and at the end. One begins before the Jewish date begins halachically, and ends after the halachic end of the day. Thus, one adds chol, mundane weekday, to the kodesh, holy day. This is considered a Scriptural requirement for Yom Kippur, and the concept is applied to other holy days as well. There is some debate on whether it is considered Scriptural for the other days.

Sanctity is extended by accepting the day early. Ideally, one should make kiddush early. At the very least, one should refrain from melacha early. One could make a verbal acceptance early even if he does not make full kiddush then. For Yom Kippur, one refrains from eating or drinking early as well. At the end of the day, one extends it in the same way. During twilight, it is forbidden to do any of this anyhow, due to the doubt about the status of the period. Therefore, to properly fulfill this, one must add before sunset on Erev Yom Kippur and after nightfall on Motzai Yom Kippur. There is no prescribed amount of time that one must add. Some say that the absolute minimum, which is a moment, is the Scripturally required amount. Any additional amount is Rabbinical.

Accordingly, in our case, the person reciting havdalah would want to delay it as long as possible. Since he does not intend to eat now, he would like to wait with havdalah as well. Nonetheless, he has some responsibility to help the unlearned congregants. This probably supersedes his personal obligations, since it applies to a large group. In addition, by davening maariv later, one also extends the day somewhat. Therefore, it is probably better to have intent to satisfy his personal obligation at the same time. [See Brochos 52a Shabbos 118b Rosh Hashanah 9a Yuma 81b Beitza 30a, Poskim. Tur Sh Ar OC 261:2 293:1 608:1 624:2, commentaries.]

In conclusion, one may recite havdalah before maariv. He may also drink the wine if he has intent to fulfill it then. It is preferred to give the wine to a listener. The rest of the congregation should rather wait until after maariv.

♣ Sponsored by Silver family in memory of Sarah bas R. Shmuel Blumenthal a"h, whose yahrzeit is on the 11th of Elul, and Rochel Devorah bas R. Moshe Silver a"h, whose yahrzeit is on the 24th of Elul. ♣

© Rabbi Shimon Silver, September 2011.

Subscriptions and Sponsorships available. (412) 421-0508. halochoscope@hotmail.com

The mitzvah is to recite the brochos over a cup of wine. However, to fulfill one's obligation it is not necessary to actually drink the wine. One may listen to the pronunciation of havdalah by another. Ultimately, the wine must be drunk by someone. The poskim debate whether it must be drunk by the person reciting, and if so, how much of it he must drink. We do not follow this view, though it is preferable to satisfy it as well. There is also an issue of the brocha on the wine, that is both a bircas hanehenin, brocha on benefit, and brocha on the mitzvah. As such, in order to avoid having recited the brocha in vain, someone who listened to the brochos must drink it. Usually it is the person who recites it, but in many instances it is given to another person.

The usual order is to recite havdalah in tefilah and then to recite it again over wine. As we have shown and will discuss, one should really avoid eating or drinking before maariv anyhow. If one forgot to include it in tefilah, he need not repeat tefilah, since he will be reciting it over wine. This is not necessarily because the main institution is on the wine. Rather, it is because either can satisfy one's obligation, in the event that he forgot, or made an unintended 'mistake'.

May one reverse the order? Moreover, if one already recited it on wine, may he still include it in tefilah? The question is whether the main institution is to recite it on wine, or whether the original institution including it in tefilah remains the principal, with wine added on as well. While the Talmud poses this question, and seems to conclude that the main institution is in tefilah, this is not cited by all poskim. This leads some to conclude that it is debated halachically, and that some follow the view that the institution on wine replaces the original institution in tefilah. The Talmud discusses one who ate before kiddush. He should wait to recite it the next day, before eating. Regarding havdalah, this is debated. The consensus follows the view that one may still recite it that night. What if one forgot to include it in tefilah, then ate before reciting it on wine? In this case, one must repeat tefilah and include it. This is compared to forgetting both at night. One must recite both the next morning. Based in part on this, the poskim discuss whether the wine institution is now considered the primary one. Accordingly, some say that one who recited it on wine before maariv should not include it in tefilah later. However, it seems that the majority say that it should still be included in tefilah.

In our case, the person reciting it could, theoretically, have in mind not to discharge his personal obligation, then give the wine to a listener. As we shall see, aravus permits such arrangements. This way, he could recite it in tefilah, then fulfill his personal obligation afterwards. However, it would appear that there is no need for him to do so, since we follow the opinion that if they are reversed one still fulfills both. The question is whether one may intentionally reverse the order. There is no clear indication on this. In our case, due to the other factors, it would certainly be permissible. [See Mechilta Yisro 20:8, Brochos 20b 33a 51b-53b, Psachim 105b-107a 117b, Nazir 4a, Shvuos 18b 20b, Poskim. Ramb. Shabbos 29:1. Chinuch 31. Tur Sh Ar OC 271 293-298 esp. 294:1-2 299:1 10, commentaries. Uvacharta Bachaim 84.]

B) Eating before havdalah or maariv

Once the time for havdalah arrives, it is forbidden to eat anything before reciting havdalah. This is for a combination of reasons. Generally, a mitzvah that must be performed at a specific time is in danger of being neglected if one occupies himself in other activities at that time. For some of these, including before davening maariv, beginning a set meal is forbidden even before the time for the mitzvah arrives. In the case of havdalah, even a small taste of anything but water is forbidden. In addition, to show respect for Shabbos by distinguishing it, one should not engage in distracting activities when havdalah should be on his mind. Some say that there is a point in fulfilling it at the earliest opportunity, though one should also try to delay ending Shabbos, somewhat. Some maintain that the idea is that the first taste after Shabbos is over should be the havdalah wine. In light of this, if one intends to eat a small amount before maariv, which is permissible, since it is not a set meal, he must still recite havdalah first. Understandably, this would apply primarily after a fast, like Yom Kippur, or (Tisha B'av Sunday).

The Talmud discusses whether one need stop eating for havdalah, and whether one who already ate something may still recite havdalah over wine. We follow the view that one need not cease a meal. [See Brochos 4b 52a Shabbos 9b Psachim 105-7, Poskim. Tur Sh Ar OC 235:2 299:1, commentaries. Moadim Uzmanim III:245. Nitei Gavriel Yamim Noraim 51:2.]

C) Shomai'a ke'oneh; Aravus

We mentioned that one need not drink the wine, and may fulfill his obligation by listening to the brocha recited by someone else. This is the rule of shomaia ke'oneh, one who hears is the same as one who 'responds'. Mitzvos that require an utterance may usually be fulfilled by listening to another person pronouncing them. There must be mutual intent of both speaker and listener to fulfill the mitzvah in this fashion. Every word must be sounded and heard clearly.

Birchos hanehenin, brochos on personal benefit, are not usually considered brochos on mitzvos. Therefore, each person benefiting must recite his own brocha. If two or more people are kovai'a, station themselves at a place and agree to join in one meal, they may have one person recite the brocha. Each, including the reciter, eats or drinks after the brocha. Thus, if one is not benefiting himself, he may not discharge the obligation of another. This implies that if the brocha or utterance is for a mitzvah purpose, even one who does not fulfill the mitzvah with this utterance may sound it for the sake of others who use it for their obligation.

This last idea is called arvus or aravus, literally responsibility. All Jews are responsible for one another. This is derived from a verse and is considered Scriptural. [Although most brochos are not Scripturally formulated, the concept of a brocha, and of other utterance requirements, is Scriptural.] As each Jew is responsible for his fellow, they may all be considered part of the same 'body'. One may speak for his fellow even when the speaker is not involved in the performance of the mitzvah himself. However, the speaker must be a bar chiyuva, one obligated in the mitzvah, to be considered responsible for his fellow bar chiyuva. A minor or one otherwise exempt may not act as arav.

This is why the person reciting havdalah need not drink the wine. He may even recite it after he has already fulfilled the mitzvah himself. He has no current obligation, but is a person with an obligation of his own. He simply discharged it beforehand.

If the person obligated is able to do the mitzvah by himself, it preferable that he not